The Electric Light.

A Brilliant Scene Under Canvas.

(From the Honolulu Press.)

The electric light at the circus has proved a wonderful thing. On Saturday night, when the people entered the first menagerie tent, it was as light as mid-day and a man's shadow reflected on the ground, was as clear and clean cut as if it were done in silhouette. Holding up the hands, pantomime fashion, every curve and motion of the fingers could be seen with the distinctness and clearness of an illuminated picture. Above the head, which seemed to be two small balls of fire, without any flame or smoke, and of such dazzling brilliancy that the naked eye could hardly stand the glare for an instant. A million little needles of variegated light seemed to be perpetually shooting out from the body of the fire, giving each the appearance of a small chestnut burr. Looking at the lights through smoked glass they took on an entirely different appearance. The little needles were not there, and the eyes saw simply a round ball of white fire, about the size of a small marble, seeming, in its whiteness and the intensity of its heat like a drop of molten metal. Two of these small lights burned there, rigged on poles, about thirty feet apart, in the large menagerie tent, lighting up the place in a way that no other light could be distinguished as completely as by the light of day. Passing into the next menagerie tent, the same light was presented. Here two electric lights produced the same effect as in the first tent. The brightness was wonderful, and moonlight ever sent out a tenth part of such brilliancy. So completely were the tents illuminated that from the outside could be plainly seen on the white canvas the shadow of the animals and wagons, and even of the men walking about inside.

But the great scene was in the circus tent. It was large enough to contain both the menagerie tents. Here were six electric lights. The gas light had been used on the circus tent, but the difference was remarkable. The electric lights were of the purest and softest white; the gas light, though burning at a full heat, seemed faded and yellow. Although the electric light in the circus tent was not as bright as the gas light, it was more comfortable to the audience, every book and corner of the immense tent was as bright as day. An idea of the power of a single light of this kind—which is said to be the latest and most improved—may be gained when it is known that when allowed to burn without a globe it will make a shadow out of a gas light.

There was great curiosity and no little anxiety among the circus people as to the electric light used to see the thing work. The intention was to have it, if possible, in operation on the opening night, Monday last, but when the time came it was found it could not be done. Three or four experienced men were on by the Telegraph Supply Company, of Cleveland, the manufacturers of the machine, to get it in order. On Friday night everything was in readiness and the machine was put into operation. This is the first time the electric light has been used in the circus, and its success has been a great card to the manufacturers as well as to the circus managers. The latter have bought the exclusive right to use it on their canvas. The cost of the machine was $25,000. It is the largest machine of the kind made. It is known as the Bush dynamo-electric light. Charles Bush being the inventor.

Any one who understands anything about telegraphy will be able to form an idea of the way in which the machine is run. There is a regular battery, worked by a thirty horse-power engine with a forty horse-power boiler. This engine has been built expressly for this electric light by the Fitchburg Engine Company, of Fitchburg, Massachusetts, and is constructed on a wagon, occupying one end while the battery occupies another. The battery seems simple in its construction but all powerful in its effects.

"Have any of you gentlemen watched in your pocket?" asked one of the electric light men. "I have," said one of the electric light men. "I have," said another. "I have," said a third. "I have," said a fourth. "I have," said a fifth. "I have," said a sixth. "I have," said a seventh. "I have," said an eighth. "I have," said a ninth. "I have," said a tenth.
